On May 27th, 2021, the U.S. Census Bureau released its sub-county population estimates, April 1, 2010 to July 1, 2020. Included are the resident population estimates for the 1,200 incorporated places in Texas, 9 of which were newly added and 13 of which have surpassed the population threshold of 50,000 since 2010. Of the 71 larger cities with population more than 50,000 in Texas, only two have lost population. In total, they contributed to more than 55% of the state population growth in the last decade. Small- and mid-size cities around the major metropolitan areas have seen the fastest growth rates, while many cities in west Texas and the Panhandle area are among the 372 cities that have lost population.
